

LODGE'S LOGIC UPSETS LODGE

Speech in 1906 on Algerias Affair Reverse of Present Views

WARNED THE SENATE

Told Colleagues They Had No Right to Interfere With President

New York, March 21.—The World today prints the following editorial:

LODGE VERSUS LODGE
President Lowell, of Harvard, in the course of the joint debate with Senator Lodge in Boston on the league of nations, submitted the following questions to the Senator:

"As the senior United States Senator from this state, as the leader of our party in the Senate, we have the right to ask you, Senator Lodge—first, whether you will or will not vote for the covenant of Paris, provided it is amended as you wish; what amendments do you want, and why do you not submit them?"

Senator Lodge made no direct answer to any of these questions. In regard to the first, he expressed the pious hope that "we shall have a league in proper form," but "in my belief it will be done somewhere and in Paris," the only place in which there is any possibility of its being done.

In respect to the second and third questions, Senator Lodge, as the author of the Round Robin, insisted that it happened to be a Senator of the United States. "I cannot speak with the authority of the Senate," he said, "under the constitution, the right to advise and consent."

Then the Senator proceeded to attack President Wilson for the manner in which the negotiations have been conducted, and said:

"If the President of the United States had done what other Presidents have done, if he had laid that before the Senate—I am only asking something that has been done by almost all our Presidents, who have consulted the Senate about entering into negotiations, about awards, about pending negotiations."

Pretending that Jackson, that Grant, that Washington, that Lincoln had done this, although he carefully refrained from citing a single instance, Senator Lodge continued:

"If the President had laid that draft before the Senate, as these other Presidents have done, if he had said to you for your advice, I hope for your approval and for such suggestions as you may have to make, he would have had the amendment laid before him to present to the Peace Conference in Paris. The battle would have been more than half won by the mere submission."

"He not only did not lay it before us, before the constitutional body which is entitled to advise him, but he does not call the Senate together now to advise him."

Senator Lodge's grievance, then, is not so much against the league of nations as against the conduct of President Wilson in refusing to consult the Senate in advance as to the provisions of the constitution and the terms of the treaty of peace.

Whether that is a valid grievance or not we shall leave to Senator Lodge himself to decide. A similar question arose in the Senate in January, 1906, in regard to President Roosevelt's action in relation to the Alcatraz prisoners in the Santo Domingo affair. This is what Senator Lodge, speaking on the action of the Senator chamber, said on January 24, 1906, in regard to the respective powers of the President and the Senate in the matter of treaties (Congressional Record, page 1470):

"No one, I think, can doubt the absolute power of the President to initiate and carry on negotiations, and after a treaty has been returned to him with the ratification of the Senate, to withhold it from ratification if he sees fit so to do. There is no question that the Senate can by resolution advise the President to enter upon a negotiation, or advise the President to refrain from a negotiation; but those resolutions have no binding force whatsoever, and the President becomes operative and actually effective only when a treaty is actually submitted to it. We have no possible right to break suddenly into the middle of a negotiation and demand from the President what instructions he has given to his representatives."

Furthermore, in the course of that speech Senator Lodge has his unqualified approval to the remarks of Senator Spooner of the day before, in the course of which that great constitutional lawyer had thus defined the President's powers:

"From the foundation of the government it has been conceded in practice and in theory that the constitution vests the power of negotiation and the various powers—and they are multiform—of the conduct of our foreign relations exclusively in the President. He does not exercise that constitutional power, nor can he be made to do it, under the tutelage or guardianship of the Senate or of the House, or of the Senate and House combined."

"When he shall have negotiated and sent his proposed treaty to the Senate the jurisdiction of that body attaches and its powers begin. It may advise and consent or it may refuse. And in the exercise of this function it is independent of the executive as he is independent of it in the matter of negotiation."

And Henry Cabot Lodge, in unqualifiedly indorsing Senator Spooner's speech, said: "I quite realize that after the manner in which he has dealt with those questions, anything that I may say is in great danger of being an anticlimax."

Judging Senator Lodge from his speech in Boston Wednesday night, and from his speech in the Senate January 24, 1906, what are we to assume? That there is one constitution for Republican Presidents and quite a different constitution for Democratic Presidents? That Republican Presidents have complete constitutional power to originate and negotiate treaties independently of the Senate, but that Democratic Presidents must first consult the Senate and ask permission to negotiate?

We are reluctant to think that Senator Lodge is playing partisan politics with this grave issue of the league of nations—that he is more concerned about discrediting President Wilson than he is about helping to guarantee the peace of the world and prevent a repetition of this terrible war. But what conclusion are we to form from his speech of January 24, 1906, and his speech of March 19, 1919? How can they be reconciled? What is the mystery of this extraordinary case of Lodge versus Lodge?
